Short Summary

According to Chinese Human Rights Defenders, on December 15, 2009, authorities in Sichuan province released activist Chen Yunfei. Police from Qingliu township in Xindu district, Chengdu city reportedly took Chen from his home and held him in the Qingliu police station for six days. Authorities provided no documentation authorizing the detention and the reason for it is unclear. Chen has had numerous run-ins with authorities in recent years in connection with his activism on a range of issues, including education, the May 2008 Sichuan earthquake, police misconduct, and the 1989 Tiananmen protests. In November 2009, he filed a lawsuit against a local education bureau claiming they were charging exorbitant fees. The next day officials questioned him for a slogan he was wearing asking Party officials to publicize their private holdings. In 2007, he served six months of residential surveillance for placing an ad in a local paper to mark the anniversary of the Tiananmen protests.
